HICTANER 'The Man Fish' A Strange Story of Mystery and Fanaticism

PART ONE—(Centinued.)

Severac lighted the way with a lantern brought from the launch. Soon they were standing before a door. The key was in the lock—lock and key being of galvanized iron, which explained the absence of rust.

Sever, and said in a hollow voice:

"To tell you the truth, I feared that your attitude would be what it was three days ago. I have come to say this, Moisette: I only want you of your own free will. I will wait. I will be the most respectful and devoted of friends."

"Monsieur. If you feel as you say."

Severac, nevertheless, was obliged you do," interrupted Moisette bitterly,

Severac, nevertheless, was obliged to make some effort to turn the key and open the door, which creaked on its hinges.

"It is almost two years since anyone was here. Go in first, Moisette."

Coldly and disdainfully Moisette entered, without looking at the man. They crossed a little empty chamber. Severac opened a second door ber. Severac opened a second door and when he had let in Moisette first and when he and closed the door after them he lighted the candles in the silver can-diesticks on the table and the con-

Moisette saw plainly that she was in a sort of salon, hung with fine old tapestries and most richly and comfortably furnished.

She was surprised, but she carefully refrained from showing it.

"These are your quarters," said Severac. "You need expect to see no passed the point to her throat.

"One step more," she cried, "and I will kill myself:" fully refrained from showing it.

"Back of the dining room you will find a kitchen, with kerosene stove to heat or cook your food.
"You see, Moisette, everything is here for you but a cook and a chambermaid. Very soon, though, your servants will be here.
"In the meantime, however, you will be obliged to care for yourself entirely.

"If you should press one of the ivory buttons which you see above the wainscoting in several places, I would hear your call and would come. "But, mademoiselle, you must need rest, for the passage was rough and you slept badly in the hammock. I

He did this in spite of his desire to go to Moisette a desire which he fought and conquered.

His apartment consisted of four rooms, a bedroom, diningroom, kitchen, and a great laboratory, fitted with the most approved apparatus, and in which Severae had once made the bombs which had been thrown in all the great cities of Spain, France, and Italy.

Molstette appeared, very pale, with great rings under her awollen eyes. Still calm and proud, she went to the center of the salon, followed by Newrac. Turning toward her captor she said:

"What do you wish, monaleur"
Severac was surprised. He expected to find the young girl in a state of nervous collapse and despair, which would drive her to him, but, on the contrary, she was stronger and more resolute than ever.

"Mademoiselle," he said with an affectation of respect, "I have come to ask you what your attitude toward my regard for you now is."

"What would I low your? I despite you."

"You still do not love me?"

"How could I low you? I despite you."

books. Does your apartment suit you?"

"Call it my prison, monsieur," replied Moisette, coidly.

"Tour prison, indeed!" sneered Severac. "The outer air comes in through the crevices in the rock overour heads. Look up. Do you see the carved ceiling? Each rock is perforated in the center by twenty holes, invisible from here. These holes communicate with conduits which bring the air from outside.

"It is a very ingenious arrangement, and a fly would be too large to enter, still less to leave if brought in the way we came. I think you understand, mademoisells."

After bowing, Severac went on:

"My apartment is in another part of the grotices, but it is connected with your own by means of electric wires.

Piqued and infuriated, Severac lifted his shoulders and said angrily:

"You may play the stoic. Solitude and captivity will soften your heart. You are mine and no power on earth can take you from me."

He made a threatening gesture, then returned to the launch, carefully closing the two doors behind him.
